

Oxford Cambridge and RSA

Friday 7 June 2019 – Morning

GCSE (9–1) English Language

J351/02 Exploring effects and impact

Reading Insert

Time allowed: 2 hours

You must have:

- the Question Paper

INSTRUCTIONS

- The materials in this Reading Insert are for use with the questions in Section A of the Question Paper.

INFORMATION

- This document consists of 8 pages. Any blank pages are indicated.

Details of text extracts:

Text 1

Text: adapted from The Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner

Author: Alan Sillitoe (1959)

Text 2

Text: adapted from The Ingenious Edgar Jones

Author: Elizabeth Garner (2007)

Text 1

This is an extract from Alan Sillitoe's short story, "The Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner", published in 1959. The narrator (Smith) is an inmate in a Borstal – a prison for young offenders. He enjoys cross-country running and is one of the best at it in the prison. Here, he is setting out on an early morning run.

And this long-distance running lark is the best of all, because it makes me think so good that I learn things even better than when I'm on my bed at night. And apart from that, what with thinking so much while I'm running I'm getting to be one of the best runners in the Borstal. I can go my five miles round better than anybody else I know.

5 So as soon as I tell myself I'm the first man ever to be dropped into the world, and as soon as I take that first flying leap out into the frosty grass of an early morning when even birds haven't the heart to whistle, I get to thinking, and that's what I like. I go my rounds in a dream, turning at lane or footpath corners without knowing they're there, and shouting good morning to the early cow-milker without seeing him.

10 It's a treat being a long-distance runner, out in the world by yourself with not a soul to make you bad-tempered or tell you what to do or that there's a shop to break and enter a bit back from the next street. Sometimes I think that I've never been so free as during that couple of hours when I'm trotting up the path out of the gates and turning by that bare-faced, big-bellied oak tree at the lane end. Everything's dead, but good, because it's dead before coming alive,
15 not dead after being alive. That's how I look at it.

Mind you, I often feel frozen stiff at first. I can't feel my hands or feet or flesh at all, like I'm a ghost who wouldn't know the earth was under him if he didn't see it now and again through the mist. But even though some people would call this frost-pain suffering if they wrote about it to their mams in a letter, I don't, because I know that in half an hour I'm going to be warm,
20 that by the time I get to the main road and am turning on to the wheatfield footpath by the bus stop I'm going to feel as hot as a potbellied stove and as happy as a dog with a tin tail.

Text 2

This is an extract from the novel, "The Ingenious Edgar Jones", by Elizabeth Garner (published in 2007). William Jones is a Porter (watchman) at Oxford University. In this passage, it is evening, and he is leaving his home in Jericho, a part of Oxford where he lives with his pregnant wife Eleanor, to go to his work in St Giles.

The night that William Jones's world changed began like any other.

5 At six o'clock he rose from his bed. At quarter-past six he took tea and toast with his wife, Eleanor, in their front parlour. And at half-past six, to the beat of the bell of the grandfather clock, he buttoned up his coat, pulled his hat down upon his head, kissed his wife and lifted the latch of the front door.

The steady pace of his footsteps marked out the half-hour walk across Oxford. It was a cold February night. The night was clear and pinpricked with stars. The moon was nothing but a splinter, the curl of a stray feather stuck to the velvet dark of the sky. William pulled up his collar and watched the mists of his breath rope through the air before him.

10 He always loved the turning from the lanes of Jericho out on to St Giles. It was an invisible boundary between the quiet domestic world where he was a loving husband and the University where he was a watchman at the college gates. Every time he trod this path he would reflect how the change in the streets echoed the differences between his worlds.

15 The roads of Jericho twisted in upon themselves, and a man could get easily lost. It was sometimes thus when he was sitting by the fireside with his wife. The conversation would ebb and flow between them, full of affection, and talk of the daughter that was blossoming in her belly. But there were times when there were shadowed corners in their speech, when a thing might not mean to Eleanor what it meant to him, and he would feel that he had taken a wrong turning down a dark alley, and was sitting in a room that seemed in outwards appearance to be his home, but was not.

20 Whereas when he emerged on to the University streets, there stood the broad walls of the colleges, set shoulder to shoulder, their domes, spires and battlements pointing magnificently towards the heavens. And here William knew exactly who he was: he was Porter Jones, warden of the nights, the man who watched over great minds as they slumbered. Here
25 William had a place and a function, and no one could shift him from it.

OCR

Oxford Cambridge and RSA

Copyright Information

OCR is committed to seeking permission to reproduce all third-party content that it uses in its assessment materials. OCR has attempted to identify and contact all copyright holders whose work is used in this paper. To avoid the issue of disclosure of answer-related information to candidates, all copyright acknowledgements are reproduced in the OCR Copyright Acknowledgements Booklet. This is produced for each series of examinations and is freely available to download from our public website (www.ocr.org.uk) after the live examination series.

If OCR has unwittingly failed to correctly acknowledge or clear any third-party content in this assessment material, OCR will be happy to correct its mistake at the earliest possible opportunity.

For queries or further information please contact The OCR Copyright Team, The Triangle Building, Shaftesbury Road, Cambridge CB2 8EA.

OCR is part of the Cambridge Assessment Group; Cambridge Assessment is the brand name of University of Cambridge Local Examinations Syndicate (UCLES), which is itself a department of the University of Cambridge.